“Driving home from Cradle Mountain in late spring, my route twisted down the steep slopes in a wash of colour. Shockingly beautiful glimpses of the ranges came and went, receding in crags of blue and brown; the foreground held a deep, inky green. Even the sky felt full of colour.

Back in the studio, I started sketching and mixing from memory, guided only by the impressions that remained. Cethana I and Cethana II are the result of this journey.

Alongside these works, I developed a large autumnal diptych, capturing the view from my studio. When the Air Turns reflects a landscape I am fortunate to encounter daily, and yet it is never the same. At this time of year, looking out over the hills, I can smell the seasonal shift in the air before I even step outside. There is a melancholy beauty to this season; a quiet stirring that revives memories of all autumns that have come before.”
